LEBANON: An accommodation has apparently been reached between the government and the fedayeen, but the army is still maintaining control over fedayeen activities in Lebanon.

Cairo radio announced on 25 September that a "complete understanding" had been reached between the Lebanese Government and the fedayeen, and that delegations representing both parties would go to southern Lebanon to work out the details.

The number of fedayeen in the south has been substantially reduced since the Israeli attack on 16-17 September.

Those who remain are not near populated areas and their movements are restricted. The army is maintaining control by means of roving patrols and numerous checkpoints, and a few fedayeen have been wounded as a result of their refusal to submit to army searches.

Although the major fedayeen groups have apparently acquiesced to the agreement and to continuing army restrictions, some splinter groups may not, and further incidents between them and the army could occur.
